As an undergraduate student, you will probably be expected to do some writing in most of your courses. Even if the course doesn't require you to submit a paper, it may require you to write an essay examination. Therefore, an important part of learning at college includes becoming familiar with the structure of an essay as well as achieving the level of competence in writing expected by college professors. Writing skills are emphasized in assignments at college because writing is an essential tool for communication in the working world; these assignments help you to develop the critical thinking and writing skills that will be important even after graduation.

Some students believe that writing ability is evaluated only in courses within the English Department. This isn't true at MSSU where all students are required to take five writing intensive courses for their degree.

Written assignments in college can vary in length from a one-page essay question on an examination to a 20- or 30-page research paper. They can also vary in the level of analysis as well as in the amount and type of research required. You may be asked simply to describe a process or event, or to analyze or evaluate how and why that process or event occurs. Some assignments will require you to read and discuss a single work assigned to you, while others will require you to conduct some kind of library research to find out about your topic and to bring together in your paper information from a variety of sources. This is called secondary research, and requires you to learn to properly acknowledge your research sources when you write. Primary research occurs when you yourself make some observations on an experiment, survey or study, as is expected in science lab courses as well as in some social science and humanities research courses. But even those papers produced from primary research will usually involve the use of some kind of secondary research to discuss how your results compare to those of experts in the field.

What is an Essay?

The term essay is used broadly for many different kinds of papers. Essentially, it refers to a written document which somehow discusses, explains, analyzes, interprets or evaluates a topic in an organized and coherent manner. The terminology used to refer to an assignment and the requirements for length, level of analysis and amount of research vary not only between disciplines but also between courses within a discipline. Following are some examples of terminology which may be used in various disciplines.

In an introductory English literature course, you may be asked to write an essay as a literary essay or literary analysis which interprets a poem, short story or novel and uses only that piece of work and your own ideas as your sources. In more advanced English courses you may also be using the published opinions of other critics to support and expand your interpretation.
An assignment which asks you to do some library research to write on a topic may be referred to as an essay, a paper, a research essay, a research paper, a term assignment, or a term paper. The terminology is not necessarily consistent: a term paper may tend to be a longer paper written in advanced courses, but not necessarily. You may be assigned a specific topic or asked to choose your own from subjects relevant to the course; the assignment will require you to read up on a specific topic, using either books or journal articles, and to integrate those sources to inform or persuade a reader.

An assignment requiring a literature review or research review may be asking you to choose a specific topic and then to read journal articles written by experts about their own research. In this kind of paper you will be summarizing and comparing the results of research conducted on that topic. In some advanced courses you may also be required to do some critical evaluation of the kind and quality of research being done. The term 'literature,' as it is used in this assignment, refers to published research material rather than English literature or fiction.

Although the word report may also occasionally be used for many of the assignments described above, it is most often used to describe a lab report or research report written in science, psychology, sociology, or business courses to report primary research. A book report or book review is usually a summary of your critical opinion of one or more books, possibly supported by research into what other critics have said.

Overall, the message here is not to worry about what the assignment is called, but instead to concentrate your efforts on reading and understanding every detail of what is asked of you in the assignment description. Some professors may include details about not only the length and due date, but also the number and kind of research sources to use, the kind of information to include, and even the method of organization to follow. Pay close attention to those instructions, because they are the professor's guidelines to you about what he/she will be looking for in evaluating the paper. Therefore, when you receive an assignment, the first and most useful thing you can do is to read the assignment instructions carefully and make sure you understand what is required before proceeding. Check with the professor if you are uncertain about any aspect of the requirements.

The Structure of an Essay

In general, written assignments require you to include introductory paragraph(s) and concluding paragraph(s) as well as a body containing any number of supporting paragraphs. Some longer essays may require the use of headings for introduction and conclusion as well as for categories in the body, whereas shorter essays may not.
In the introduction, you should begin with the general issue and narrow down to the specifics of the problem you are discussing in your paper. Think of it as an inverted triangle. You should use the introduction to provide background information about the broad subject, identify the relevant problem or issue, and take the reader step by step to an understanding of why the specific focus of this paper is relevant to that subject. An introduction usually ends with some sort of statement of your focus (e.g., thesis statement, purpose statement, or hypothesis). This statement tells the reader specifically what point you are going to make or prove in your essay, and, if possible, how you are going to go about doing that. You might, therefore, suggest the method of organization you will be using in your paper, but not actually provide the information about the points.

In the body, you are providing information and arguments that should follow logically from the point expressed in your thesis statement and should support it consistently throughout the paper. The body is made up of a series of paragraphs: packages of information each beginning with a topic sentence which identifies the topic of the paragraph in the same way that the thesis statement for the essay defines the specific topic of the essay. The topic sentence also provides a link not only to the previous paragraph but also to the thesis statement of the essay, identifying how this information contributes to the stand you've taken. The topic of the paragraph is then developed with sentences which may provide examples, details, evidence or analogies. A broader concluding sentence for the paragraph may also be provided to tie the information together and remind the reader of how it relates to the focus of the essay.

The conclusion, unlike the introduction, moves from specific to general. It often begins with a restatement of the thesis statement, summarizes the main points of the supporting paragraphs, and ends with a broader conclusion about how the topic relates to the general issue described in the introduction. The general rule is that no new information should be brought into the conclusion: everything in the conclusion should logically follow from the information provided to the reader in the paper. Just as in a detective story you don't want to find out in the last scene that the crime was committed by a character you just met, in an essay a reader doesn't want to be introduced in the conclusion to a major piece of information which wasn't even discussed in the body of the paper.

If all this information seems new or complicated, don't worry. Remember that practice will help you to improve your writing. And try following a few simple guidelines listed on the handout in the Learning Center titled, "Improving Your Writing."

NEED MORE INFORMATION?

The Learning Center is one of the best sources on campus for advice and information on learning and study related issues. Appointments are available with staff professionals for assistance in learning and writing skills. The Learning Center is staffed by a group of peer tutors from a variety of disciplines and online writing tutoring is available. Requests may be sent to WritingHelp@MSSU.EDU. The Learning Center also offers Basic Composition (ENG 080) for students whose Writing Placement scores indicate a need for developmental composition.

The LEARNING CENTER, 659-3725

Special thanks to the University of Guelph